

Financial considerations on divorce or dissolving a civil partnership

Our aim is always to negotiate an agreement on the financial aspects of your separation. But sometimes that's just not possible, and in this situation you'll need to apply to the court.

Either one of you can apply for an order and the court has wide powers in deciding how to divide up your assets. For example, the court can:

- + Sell assets and distribute the proceeds
- + Transfer assets, including your pensions, between you
- + Reverse the sale of assets
- + Order one of you to pay the other a lump sum or regular maintenance

When deciding how to divide your assets, the court considers a range of factors, including:

- + Your standard of living before separation
- + Your income, earning potential, property and other financial resources which you have, or are likely to have in the future
- + Your financial needs and responsibilities, both now and in the foreseeable future
- + The contribution made by either party, both now and in the future, to the home or by caring for the family

To assess what would be a reasonable financial settlement, you'd need to supply additional financial information, including the:

- + value of your home and any other properties that either of you own
- + amount outstanding on your mortgage
- + surrender value of any endowment or life insurance policies

Your family home

With your home, the court has two main options:

- + Order the sale and distribute any profits between you both
- + Transfer the property into one of your names in return for a lump sum payment or transfer of another asset to the other person

The court won't normally order the sale of your property whilst it is needed as a home for any of your children unless there is enough money to be rehoused.

This means that the person not looking after the children may need to wait until the children have left full time education for their share in the value of the home. Each case is however decided on its facts.

Maintenance between partners

The court can order that one of you pays maintenance to the other.

If there are no children then maintenance might not be considered unless there's a large difference in your incomes.

Clean Break Orders

Once your finances are agreed, you can apply for a Clean Break Order.

This prevents either of you from having any further claim against the other person or their estate in the future. This might not be possible if there is ongoing maintenance.

What is the court procedure?

The court procedure can take around 9 months, but normally settles well within this time frame.

When an application is made, the court will fix a first appointment.

You'll both need to complete a Form E – this is a detailed questionnaire for recording all of your financial assets and liabilities.

Your Form E will be exchanged with your former partner at least 35 days before the first appointment. We'll go through it with you in order to:

- + Identify any questions which need to be asked about the financial circumstances disclosed by that Form E
- + Determine whether any documents are needed from your partner to support what they are saying about their financial circumstances

At the first appointment

The first appointment is conducted with the objective of defining the issues and saving costs. The court may make directions about the valuation of assets, obtaining expert evidence and the evidence that needs to be produced by both parties.

It's also an opportunity for you both to meet at court and try to negotiate a settlement.

Financial considerations on divorce or dissolving a civil partnership

If you reach a settlement, the court will make an order there and then.

If a settlement can't be reached, the court will say how the case is to proceed. A date will also be fixed for the Financial Dispute Resolution Hearing, or FDR.

If there were any questions to be answered, or any documents needed, we would serve your partner's solicitors with a questionnaire or a request for documents.

The FDR hearing

The FDR is your second opportunity to meet at court and negotiate a settlement.

The judge will often give an indication on the most likely outcome based on the facts available at that time. However it isn't binding and a different judge at the final hearing may come to a different conclusion.

If you're able to negotiate an agreement and the case can be settled at this stage, the court will make an order immediately. Otherwise a date will be fixed for the final hearing. It is sometimes possible to have the FDR heard at the first appointment.

The final hearing

At the final hearing, you'll both set out your proposal for the order you think the court should make. The judge may hear evidence from you both.

The court procedure is such to encourage agreement and settlement. Both parties are obliged to be realistic about the financial aspects of divorce and to make realistic offers.

If either party fails to make or accept such realistic offers, they may be penalised by having to pay the cost of proceedings for both sides. These costs can be substantial.

Likely timescales

The timetable set is strict and the court has the power to penalise you if you fail to comply with its timescales.

To avoid this we'd advise you to make offers at an appropriate time. Likewise, if an offer is received from the other party, your solicitor will advise you whether you should accept it.

If an offer is made and accepted, in most circumstances it'll be binding on you.

What if our property is jointly owned?

If your family home is in joint names, you're both owners and have equal rights to occupy the property.

There are two ways to own property together:

- + Tenants in common, or
- + Joint tenants.

Most couples hold the property together as joint tenants – this means that if one of you dies the property automatically goes to the surviving partner.

As joint tenants, you're deemed to own the property in equal shares.

If your property is owned as tenants in common you'll each have a distinct share in the property. This means that if one of you dies, their share will form part of their estate.

You'll need to check whether you hold property together as joint tenants or tenants in common.

If you're joint tenants, you may wish to sever the tenancy so that you hold the property as tenants in common.

That way, should something happen, your share will be distributed via your Will and won't automatically pass to your former partner.

You can sever the joint tenancy by writing to your partner and giving notice. You'll need to register your letter or notice with the Land Registry. You should also make a Will, if you haven't done so already.

What if my home is in my former partner's name?

We can advise you as to whether you have any interest. To protect you we would normally register a home rights charge or caution against the property

What about joint accounts + debts?

If your name appears on a joint account, such as a loan or credit card, you're known as jointly and severally liable for that debt.

This means that the creditor can sue both of you or each of you individually.

That's why it's important that you notify the creditor that you've separated so that the account can be frozen. It also stops your former partner running up further debt in your name.

You'll need to exercise caution when it comes to accounts that are used to pay bills. However we would advise that you cancel or freeze all joint credit card accounts.
